Justice is Mind is an original departure from the ordinary thriller, if only because the science it discusses is inevitable.

Other than that, it is your run of the mill excellent indie film. The man behind Justice is Mind, Mark Lund, made a movie in Central Massachusetts using no name actors and the finished product looks more than professional.

Casting the movie and then directing it, Lund found regional artists and then got everything out of them. None are household names and though no film is perfect, these guys were great.

The basic plot is that an advanced form of MRI can take even memories you have forgotten and extract them. We see one of Henri Miller's (Vernon Aldershoff) unremembered experiences on screen. The DA will try to use that to convict him of murder.

As advanced as the science is, it is not perfect and Miller's supposed recall is not his. No matter, the jury, thanks to the skillful work of Paul Lussier playing Henri's attorney, buys reasonable doubt. The real perpetrator is found in due course.

Henri's dad, Joseph Sewell, however, does not entertain any doubts and will act on his certainty. This will lead to the tragic denouement at the end of the film.

Though the use of a technology that can read and display memories on a screen, fails, does anyone doubt it is impossible. The science as presented in the movie has a few glitches, as we find out from the testimony of Carlyne Fournier as the neurologist. The movie is at the beginning of the use of the system. If such a thing can become real, even in the flawed state portrayed, there is no problem of it being perfected, given time.

Mark got the idea while watching a 60 Minutes segment discussing mind reading technology. The movie takes it to its logical conclusion of being able to access our buried memories.

The Boston Film Industry Examiner does not expect to like most movies where tech could be the star. Plot all too often is not as developed as it should be. Not so with Justice is Mind. Mr. Lund has put up well-balanced and paced movie about a probable future.

We also love to see a movie made by someone from Central Mass using local venues in what is all too often a backwater.
